

Acknowledgments

This book has been the fruit of the programs that Norman Fischer and I have been doing together and the now almost 40-year history of my collaboration with Jack Himmelstein in developing the Understanding-Based Model of mediation, to which Bob Mnookin has also made invaluable contributions over the course of our working together for over 25 years.

Looking back now, I can see the through-line of where this all came from and how it has developed. There are many people who profoundly influenced me in recognizing the importance of the inner life and its inextricable relation to our work with people in conflict.

It is hard to believe that my great friend and teacher, Harry Sloan has been dead more than 25 years, as his work still has such vibrancy in my daily personal and professional life.

The original SCPI group helped Norman and me bring the central idea of this book to life, and I'm grateful for their courage, spirit of adventure and consistent effort in making this all so real, particularly Catherine Conner, Peg Anderson, Amy Rodney and Peter Renkow who responded so enthusiastically to the original impulse.

Norman, of course, has been a source of incredible support for me, for the work, and a great working partner and teacher.

With deep gratitude, I want to acknowledge the indispensable roles that our colleagues at the Center for Understanding in Conflict, Catherine Conner and Katherine Miller, have played in our evolution, incorporating inside out as the core of our work.

I was lucky to have found Donna Frasier Glynn who was invaluable in organizing the ideas and asking just the right questions to help me locate and give expression to my internal writer.

And then there is my family. Will, Nicholas, Cassidy, and Sydney have consistently challenged me to walk my talk and have been ready, sometimes almost too much so, to point out the glaring inconsistencies when I have been wedded to ideas that need to be reexamined in the light of experience. In particular, Sydney's commitment to SCPI practices provided valuable critiques and support for this book.

And to Trish, it has been the fire, pain, and serenity of our intimacy that continually reveals to me more of who I am and can be.

I want to express my appreciation to the people I have worked with, particularly those whose cases I describe in the book and the SCPIs whose experiences I refer to. I have changed all of their identifying characteristics to protect their anonymity.
