Acknowledgments

It takes an entire committee to write a book like this, and this is the work of a dedicated group of members of the Cyberspace Committee of the American Bar Association Business Law Section. Although this book is called Internet Law for the Business Lawyer, second edition, it is complete rewrite of the 2001 publication Internet Law for the Business Lawyer. Much has changed in the area known as internet law in the past eleven years, and although those changes required a rewrite of the original book, we were inspired by the original authors, one of whom, Denis Rice, is a contributing author to this book and provided valuable guidance to me as a first-time editor.

This book was a long time in development, and the editorial team shifted during the process. Tom Laudise deserves thanks for the original vision for the book. Michael Fleming and Jonathan Rubens lent enthusiastic support as Cyberspace Committee chairs and also served as reviewers for several chapters. Kristine Dorrain and Sarah Jane Hughes served as Cyberspace Committee Publications chairs while this book was being written, and were helpful in recruiting authors and editing chapters. Committee members Eric Goldman and Candace Jones supplied invaluable peer review for several chapters. Several of the authors also pitched in with peer review, and I am grateful to them for their extra efforts. Lisa Lifshitz came up with the ideas and the organization for the section of the book dealing with cross-border issues, and I thank her for her leadership for that part of the project.

Research assistants make their professor employers look good, and Ashley Oakey, a member of the Class of 2012 of Widener University School of Law, is a stellar example. She provided expert cite-checking assistance for several of the authors, and I appreciate all of her work on this project.

In the final push to put this book into print, Steven Kinsella and Stephanie Morales, Senior Law Clerk Editors at the National Arbitration Forum, contributed terrific cite checking and other editing assistance. I am grateful to them for their hard work in finalizing this book.

Most of all, my gratitude goes out to the authors of this book. They all volunteered their time to make this book a reality, and it could not have happened without them. And of course, this book would not exist without the work of Susana Darwin of ABA Publications. Many thanks go out to Susana and her staff for transforming the work of the authors into this book.
