This informational letter applies to contributors who have signed one of the following agreements:

Contribution to a Collective Work – Periodical
Regular Contributor to a Periodical
Contribution to a Collective Work – Single Title

In addition, this information assumes that the copyright owner is the author. If the author is not the copyright owner, then the information applies to the copyright owner.

Your Rights and the ABA’s

ABA policy requires authors writing for ABA periodicals to sign an ABA publication agreement. The agreement grants the ABA the right of first publication. It also requires authors to warrant that their work is original and that publication by the ABA will not infringe on others’ rights.

The agreement is “nonexclusive,” which means that, after the ABA publishes your work, you may republish it elsewhere. You retain the rights to the original text of your contribution—the text you supplied the ABA in your original Word document. You will not need to request the ABA’s permission to use the original text in other publications or media after its first publication by the ABA. However, if you do republish your original work, we request that you credit the ABA for first publication (see below). The ABA also retains the right to not publish a submission.

Signing Your Agreement; Where and How to Send It

Please sign and return your publication agreement to the editor of the publication to which you are contributing. The signed agreement should be emailed to the editor as a PDF or it can be sent via fax; an original signed copy is not necessary. Please keep a copy of your signed agreement for your files. Please note that the ABA is unable to accept an agreement that has been signed by someone other than the author.

To Reprint Your Original Text

Credit the ABA.
The ABA requests that, if and when you republish your original text, you credit the ABA publication in which your article first appeared. This permission to reprint your original text also allows you permission to reprint your specific contribution as it appeared in the original ABA publication. While you retain the copyright to your original text, you do not hold copyright to the article as it is laid out; supplemented with designed graphics, images, or logos; edited; and otherwise made into a final product by ABA editors and designers. These aspects of the final product are copyrighted by the ABA.

What Should the Credit Say?
The publication credit should include the article title and the name of the ABA publication, including volume, issue, and date, and the copyright notice as it appeared in the ABA publication. Below is an example for you to follow.

"©2016. Published in The Business Lawyer, Vol. 71, No. 4, Fall 2016, by the American Bar Association. Reproduced with permission. All rights reserved. This information or any portion thereof may not be copied or disseminated in any form or by any means or stored in an electronic database or retrieval system without the express written consent of the American Bar Association or the copyright holder."
Do Not Reprint Images.
You may not reuse photographs and other images. The ABA’s original licensing agreements for such visual materials typically do not permit republication. Therefore, any photographs, illustrations, cartoons, advertisements, graphic images, or other visual element appearing on a page with your text may not be used.

Do Not Reprint the ABA Logo and/or Section Logos
ABA policy strictly prohibits the reproduction of the ABA logo, covers, and mastheads.

Linking to Your Article from the ABA’s Website
You can link to your article on the ABA website and there’s no need to ask permission. Please keep in mind that many of the ABA’s publications are password-protected and cannot be accessed by non-ABA members.
