- Discusses the role law libraries should play in the reformation of legal education with a specific section on legal incubators. Recommended involvement of law libraries includes helping participants conduct research in fields with which they are unfamiliar, considering they will most likely be acting as a generalist, and helping them navigate and get to free or low-cost online research resources and databases. Also discussed is the collection development for incubator participants, as their needs do not overlap with those of students and faculty.

- Whereas most other articles discuss legal incubators with regards to pro- and low-bono services, this article discusses legal incubators in partnership with small-business incubators and the potential benefits to build legal skills in small business law.

- Discusses international law school models that advocate for professional post-graduate or concurrent professional training centers and potential avenues law schools in the United States can adopt similar practices to bridge the skill gap of law school students that is often under criticism.

- Further discusses the partnership between small business incubators and legal clinics at Washington University in which there are four teams: Interdisciplinary Innovation Team, Business Incubator Team, Pro Bono Team, and International Research Team.
