The American Bar Association’s International Law Section is bringing its Americas Conference to Costa Rica for the first time. Lawyers from around the world will convene to discuss and reimagine the future of Corporate Social Responsibility (CSR) in very practical terms.

Today's world faces significant social, economic, and environmental issues. CSR will not entirely solve these issues, but will go a long way to ensure companies operate in an ethically and morally responsible way, while better responding to the needs and values of its customers and, in the process, become more successful.

Costa Rica’s pledge to become carbon neutral by 2021 makes it an ideal location for leading experts to discuss how companies and private organizations can be part of the solution, while helping themselves to be more competitive. Over the course of two days, industry experts including in-house counsel, business leaders, and private practitioners, will discuss the latest trends and developments regarding ethical business practices and groundbreaking CSR issues, including their view of what next generation CSR should look like.

This Conference provides a unique opportunity to learn from leading industry experts about corporate governance and the future of CSR. It will open doors to potential new areas of law, and position private practitioners to provide cutting edge ideas and solutions to clients striving to get ahead in this critical area.

who will be there

Lawyers from around the world, including private practitioners, in-house counsel, business leaders, and academics, will convene to explore the future of CSR and how they, their organizations, and their clients can be part of the solution.

They’ll build relationships, take advantage of hours of impactful networking opportunities, have an opportunity to dine in the homes of local attorneys, and have some fun. Attendees will learn, find partners, build their client base, expand their network, and be inspired. There will be something for everyone.
