Accommodation at LMH
Lady Margaret Hall is a College of the University of Oxford. It is located in tranquil North Oxford, a leafy Victorian suburb of wide streets, splendid gothic houses and mature trees. The University Parks, Natural History Museum and Pitt Rivers Museum are all close by. The College’s quiet and beautiful location outside the busy town centre is a legacy of its origins outside the University establishment.

LMH was founded in 1878 to right a wrong: the fact that a great university saw fit to educate men, but not women. The College is named in honour of Lady Margaret Beaufort, founder of the Tudor dynasty and renowned patron of scholarship and learning. The College founder, Edward Talbot, and his companions, were inspired by a passion for learning and for equality.

In 1879 the first nine students were admitted. Elizabeth Wordsworth (1840-1932), great niece of the poet, was the first Principal. In those days, women were not allowed to graduate from Oxford University and so took a steamboat to Dublin and collected their degrees from Trinity College Dublin. That changed in 1920 when they were made full members of Oxford University. One hundred years after its foundation – in 1978 – the college opened its doors to men, as well as women. The College grew: it is now a community of 406 undergraduates, 241 graduates, and 45 fellows. LMH will always strive to overcome other barriers to learning so that it can continue to champion the “equal citizenship of the mind.”

Recently, the final stage of a 10 year building project was completed with a new graduate centre and Porters’ Lodge providing a grand entrance to the College. Built to a neoclassical design, the new buildings complete an eclectic mix of architectural styles which, together with the 12 acres of lovely gardens leading down to the River Cherwell, contribute to the College’s distinctive character.
