“The Internet of Things and Supply Chain: The Next Generation of Vulnerabilities in National Security

While the growing number of devices connected to the “Internet of Things” offers greater connectivity it poses more potential cybersecurity risks. How will these risks be defined and are our current policies adequate? What laws, policies and doctrines are missing? Managing and reviewing supply chains for these emerging networked devices that power our lives, homes and our industries is essential. How will we guard against all the threats, whether from individual hackers operating a botnet or from state sponsored foreign intelligence operations.

Joyce Corell of the NCSC will explain the criticality of strong supply chains, and advise lawyers on their role in countering and preventing these dangers.
