

I agree with Leroy's sentiment. I see the "continuation in education" situation as very similar to the situation that exists when a graduate decides to pursue a non-legal career after law school. As a collective body of legal educators and people interested in legal education, we ought to encourage this type of free thinking and free choice by our students. Leroy's point, that counting those who continue with their education after law school, as a negative for law school rankings purposes is a very good one – one that we should correct if at all possible. I realize that both Leroy's comments and mine are being submitted after the December 1 deadline, but well in advance of the December 13 date of the hearing.