INTEREST OF THE *AMICUS CURIAE*¹

The New York State School Boards Association, Inc. (“NYSSBA”) is a not-for-profit membership organization incorporated under the laws of the State of New York. Its membership consists of approximately ninety-three percent (93%) of all public school districts in New York State. Pursuant to Section 1618 of New York’s Education Law, NYSSBA has the responsibility of devising practical ways and means for obtaining greater economy and efficiency in the administration of the affairs and projects of New York’s public school districts. NYSSBA often appears as amicus curiae before both federal and state court proceedings involving constitutional and statutory issues affecting public schools, including the education of children with disabilities, and indeed has done so previously before this Court. NYSSBA fully supports the rights of disabled children. However, NYSSBA has a significant interest in ensuring that its members are not subjected to obligations related to the education of children with disabilities that exceed those specifically set forth in the Individuals with Disabilities Education Act, 20 U.S.C. §1400 et seq. (“IDEA”). Special education services are costly,² and federal financial assistance made available by the IDEA is insufficient to cover the cost of special education. NYSSBA members, like many other school districts across this country, regularly expend often scarce local financial and other resources to fully comply with their IDEA obligations, which frequently limit the type of educational choices they can afford to offer their students, including children with disabilities. A decision by this Court in favor of the respondent would impose an added financial liability on school districts that would limit the educational choices NYSSBA members could afford to offer all of their students.

² In New York alone, an examination of the most recent available data contained within The New York State School Report Card that school districts in the state must submit to the New York State Education Department reveals that during the 2004-05 school year, the average expenditure of all public schools in New York State for special education was $19,320 as compared to $8,787 for general education students. During the 2005-06 school year those figures increased to $22,354 for special education and $9,168 for general education students. The most recent student count data available from the New York State Education Department further indicates that on December 1, 2007 there were a total of 409,856 school age children ages 4-21 receiving special education programs and services.

SUMMARY OF THE ARGUMENT

The issue before this Court is whether 20 U.S.C. §1412(a)(10)(C)(ii) limits the availability of tuition reimbursement as a remedy under the IDEA only to parents of children with disabilities “who previously received special education and related services under the authority of a public agency. . . .” When asked the same question, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit, whose decision in Forest Grove School Dist. v. T.A., 523 F.3d 1078 (9th Cir. 2009), is on appeal herein, answered no.

This Court first recognized a parent’s right to tuition reimbursement under the IDEA in its 1985 decision in Burlington Sch. Comm. v. Dep’t of Educ., 471 U.S. 359 (1985), based on the statute’s grant of authority to courts to award “such relief as the court determines is appropriate” under section 1415(e)(2), currently codified at 20 U.S.C. §1415(i)(2)(C)(iii). It later expanded this right in Florence County Sch. Dist. Four v. Carter, 510 U.S. 7 (1993), ruling that a parent’s choice of a private school that does not meet state educational standards does not impede the ability to obtain such relief.

In the time since, Congress has reauthorized the IDEA twice, first in 1997 and, more recently, in 2004. During the 1997 reauthorization, Congress amended the IDEA to explicitly provide a statutory right to reimbursement (20 U.S.C. §1412(a)(10)(C)). Nothing in the 2004 reauthorization materially affects that right.

The language at issue herein first appeared in the 1997 version of the IDEA within a paragraph entitled “Children in Private Schools” (20 U.S.C. §1412(a)(10)). It is part of a subparagraph entitled “Payment For Education Of Children Enrolled In Private Schools Without Consent Of Or Referral By The Public Agency” (20 U.S.C. §1412(a)(10)(C)). That subparagraph further addresses the topics of “Reimbursement For Private School Placement” (20 U.S.C. §1412(a)(10)(C)(ii)), and “Limitation On Reimbursement” (20 U.S.C. §1412(a)(10)(C)(iii)). The 2004 reauthorization did not change this statutory structure.

The plain text of the contested language and its contextual framework make clear that the previous receipt of special education and related services under the authority of a public agency is a condition precedent to the recovery of reimbursement as a remedy under the IDEA when a school district fails to make a FAPE available. The limitation constitutes a proper exercise of congressional authority and discretion to determine who may benefit from its laws.

Even if the language of 20 U.S.C. §1412(a)(10)(C)(ii) is deemed to be ambiguous, further support for a literal interpretation thereof is found in the history of its incorporation into the IDEA. That history clearly establishes a congressional intent, continued in the 2004 reauthorization, to restrict and refine the IDEA rights of children unilaterally enrolled by their parents in private school, and the rights of their parents.

The decision of the Ninth Circuit in this case should be reversed.

ARGUMENT

I. Under The Plain Language Of 20 U.S.C. §1412(a)(10)(C)(ii) A Parent's Right To Reimbursement Under The IDEA Depends On Both A School District's Failure To Make A FAPE Available And Their Child Having Previously Received Special Education And Related Services Under The Authority Of A Public Agency.

The IDEA provisions that set forth a parent's statutory right to reimbursement under that law read, in relevant part, as follows:

(C) PAYMENT FOR EDUCATION OF CHILDREN ENROLLED IN PRIVATE SCHOOLS WITHOUT CONSENT OF OR REFERRAL BY THE PUBLIC AGENCY

(i) IN GENERAL – Subject to subparagraph (A), this part does not require a local educational agency to pay for the cost of education, including special education and related services, of a child with a disability at a private school or facility if that agency made a free appropriate public education available to the child in such private school or facility.

(ii) REIMBURSEMENT FOR PRIVATE SCHOOL PLACEMENT – If the parents of a child with a disability, who previously received special education and related services under the authority of a public agency, enroll the child in a private elementary school or secondary school without the consent of or referral by the public agency, a court or a hearing officer may require the agency to reimburse the parents for the cost of that enrollment if the court or hearing officer finds that the agency had not made a free appropriate public education available to the child in a timely manner prior to that enrollment (20 U.S.C. §1412(a)(10)(C)(i),(ii)) (emphasis added).

The bolded text highlights the specific language in controversy. First introduced during the 1997 reauthorization of the IDEA, the above quoted provisions were unchanged by the 2004 reauthorization.

As this Court explained in Arlington Central Sch. Dist. Board of Educ. v. Murphy, it must be presumed that the language of the IDEA expresses what Congress intended it to say, and means what it says (548 U.S. 291, 296 (2006)). This Court has also held that, generally, statutory words are to be given the natural meaning commonly attributed to them (see, e.g., Caminetti v. United States, 242 U.S. 470, 485-86 (1917)). An exception would apply if the plain language of a statute is susceptible to more than one meaning (Id., at 485), or if the disposition required by the statutory language is absurd (548 U.S. at 296-97). Otherwise, the policy choices articulated by Congress in the language of a statute must be upheld, regardless of the wisdom of those choices (Regan v. Taxation with Representation of Washington, 461 U.S. 540, 548-49 (1983); Harris v. McRae, 448 U.S. 297, 326 (1980)).

According to the Ninth Circuit, whose decision is the subject of the appeal before this Court, the language of 20 U.S.C. §1412(a)(10)(C)(ii) is not only ambiguous but also inconsistent with the overarching purpose of the IDEA and other provisions of the statute. For the reasons that follow, the Amicus respectfully disagrees and urges this Court to reverse the Ninth Circuit's decision and enforce the plain language of the statute.

A. The Language Of 20 U.S.C. §1412(a)(10)(C)(ii) Is Not Ambiguous.

The Ninth Circuit determined that the statutory language at issue herein is ambiguous because “its text does not clearly create a categorical bar . . . ” to tuition reimbursement when a child has not previously received special education services from a public school (Forest Grove School Dist. v. T.A., 523 F.3d at 1086). However, the natural reading of 20 U.S.C. §1412(a)(10)(C)(ii) is plainly discernable from both the common meaning of its words and its contextual features. Therefore, the statute's plain language is unambiguous and enforceable (see, Hartford Underwriters Insurance Company v. Union Planters Bank, N.A., 530 U.S. 1, 7-8 (2000)).

First incorporated into the IDEA during the 1997 reauthorization of the statute, the contested language appears in a subparagraph entitled “Payment For Education Of Children Enrolled In Private Schools Without Consent Of Or Referral By The Public Agency,” (20 U.S.C. §1412(a)(10)(C)). Moreover, it is part of a paragraph that expressly sets forth the rights of “Children in Private Schools” (20 U.S.C. §1412(a)(10)).

It is without question that the statutory framework within which Congress incorporated the language at issue herein defines both the right of children in private schools to receive IDEA services and the right of parents who unilaterally place their children in private school to obtain tuition reimbursement as a remedy under the statute. 20 U.S.C. §1412(a)(10)(C)(ii) must be read within this larger structure, rather than in isolation. From that view, the language at issue makes clear that a parent’s right to recover reimbursement as a remedy under the IDEA depends both on a district’s failure to make a FAPE available, and their child’s previous receipt of special education and related services under the authority of a public agency.

B. The Limitation Imposed By 20 U.S.C. §1412(a)(10)(C)(ii) On A Parent’s Right To Reimbursement Is A Proper Exercise Of Congressional Authority.

The Ninth Circuit also determined that interpreting the statutory language at issue herein to create a categorical bar to reimbursement as a remedy under the IDEA would be contrary to “the broader context of the statute . . . to give children with disabilities an appropriate and free education . . . [and] produce a substantive effect that is [in]compatible with the rest of the law” (523 F.3d 1078 at 1086).

However, as this Court has observed on more than one occasion, the IDEA is a funding statute (Arlington Central Sch. Dist. Board of Educ. v. Murphy, 548 U.S. at 295; Schaffer v. Weast, 546 U.S. 49, 51 (2005)). It provides federal financial assistance for states and local educational agencies that comply with various requirements designed to secure a FAPE for children with disabilities (Board of Educ. of Hendrick Hudson Central Sch. Dist. v. Rowley, 458 U.S. 176, 179 (1982); see, 20 U.S.C. §§1412; 1413).³

It is without dispute that Congress has the authority to set and revise the terms upon which it will make federal financial assistance available under its various laws, including the IDEA (548 U.S. at 296). Furthermore, it is within the discretion of Congress to determine who will benefit from the “largesse” of its laws (see, Regan v. Taxation with

Representation of Washington, 461 U.S. at 548-49; Harris v. McRae, 448 U.S. at 326).

The limitation on a parent's right to reimbursement at issue herein is but one of several changes first instituted by Congress during the 1997 reauthorization that redefined the IDEA rights of children attending private school. For example, prior to the 1997 reauthorization, the IDEA addressed the subject of children with disabilities in private schools in a subsection that set out the "REQUISITE FEATURES" that needed to be included in the plan that states meeting the IDEA's eligibility requirements must submit to the Secretary of Education (former 20 U.S.C. §1413(a)). One of the paragraphs in that subsection required that states:

(4) Set forth policies and procedures to assure –

(A) that, to the extent consistent with the number and location of children with disabilities in the State who are enrolled in private elementary and secondary schools, provision is made for the participation of such children in the program assisted or carried out under this subchapter by providing for such children special education and related services; and

(B) that –

(i) children with disabilities in private schools and facilities will be provided special education and related services (in conformance with an individualized education program as required by this subchapter) at no cost to their parents or guardian, if such children are placed in or referred to such schools or facilities by the State or appropriate local educational agency as the means of carrying out the requirements of this subchapter or any other applicable law requiring the provision of special education and related services to all children with disabilities within such State, and

(ii) in all such circumstances, the State educational agency shall determine whether such schools and facilities meet standards that apply to State and local educational agencies and that children so served have all the rights they would have if served by such agencies (former 20 U.S.C. §1413(a)(4)).

The 1997 reauthorization removed the above provisions and placed them in a new section regarding state eligibility requirements, and incorporated them, with some changes, within a new paragraph entitled “Children in Private Schools” that remains codified at 20 U.S.C. §1412(a)(10) under the current IDEA as reauthorized in 2004. Whereas the 1997 reauthorization left the text of former section 1413(a)(4)(B) virtually unchanged, it amended the text of former section 1413(a)(4)(A) so as to impose limitations that restricted the availability of IDEA services to private school students to a proportionate share of funds made available by the IDEA. Those amendments read as follows:

(A) CHILDREN ENROLLED IN PRIVATE SCHOOLS BY THEIR PARENTS – (i) IN GENERAL – To the extent consistent with the number and location of children with disabilities in the State who are enrolled by their parents in private elementary and secondary schools, provision is made for the participation of those children in the program assisted or carried out under this part by providing for such children special education and related services in accordance with the following requirements, unless the Secretary has arranged for services for those children under subsection (f):

(I) Amounts expended for the provision of those services by a local educational agency shall be equal to a proportionate amount of Federal funds made available under this part.

(II) Such services may be provided to children with disabilities on the premises of private, including parochial, schools, to the extent consistent with law (former 20 U.S.C. §1412(a)(10)(A)(i)) (emphasis added).

From its early beginnings, the IDEA reflects a history of statutory evolution and adjustments to congressional policy regarding the education of children with disabilities (see, Board of Educ. of Hendrick Hudson Central Sch. Dist. v. Rowley, 458 U.S. at 191-92). At every step, that evolution has been informed by specific findings set forth in the statute itself, and the national experience regarding implementation of previous requirements (see, S. Rep. 105-17, 5 (1997 WL 244967); H.R. Rep. 105-95 (1997 U.S.C.C.A.N. 78, 82)). Each of its reauthorizations has changed prior IDEA requirements.

The limitation on the availability of IDEA services for children in private school and the limitation on a parent's right to reimbursement at issue are part of that evolution. They constitute a departure from prior law, but also represent the articulation of congressional policy regarding the benefits available under the IDEA and the recipients of those benefits. That policy is within the discretion of Congress and must be upheld irrespective of its wisdom (see, Regan v. Taxation with Representation of Washington, 461 U.S. at 548-49 (1983); Harris v. McRae, 448 U.S. at 326 (1980)).

C. Enforcement Of The Plain Language Of 20 U.S.C. §1412(a)(10)(C)(ii) Will Not Produce An Absurd Result.

According to this Court, a literal application of otherwise plain statutory language is not appropriate if the disposition required by the terms of the language is deemed absurd because it “will produce a result demonstrably at odds with the intentions of the drafters” (United States v. Ron Pair Enterprises, Inc., 489 U.S. 235, 242 (1989)). However, that is not the case herein. As set forth above, 20 U.S.C. §1412(a)(10)(C)(ii) is part of a larger statutory framework defining the IDEA rights of children in private schools and their parents. Its enactment constituted a proper exercise of congressional authority and discretion regarding who may benefit from federal laws, and the terms and conditions applicable to the receipt of those benefits.

Nonetheless, the Ninth Circuit determined that a literal application of 20 U.S.C. §1412(a)(10)(C)(ii) would lead to an absurd result because it would make parents wait for their child to receive special education from a public school before placing the child in an appropriate private school, even when a school district is uncooperative and its special education services inappropriate. In addition, the Ninth Circuit noted that where a school district determines not to classify a child as disabled, that child “would never receive special education in public school and therefore would never be eligible for reimbursement . . . ” (523 F.3d 1078 at 1087).

However, the statutory language at issue herein initially “ensures that a parent’s rejection of a public school placement is not based on mere speculation as to whether the recommended school placement would have been appropriate” (Board of Educ. of City Sch. Dist. of City of New York v. Tom F., 2005 WL 22866, at *3 (S.D.N.Y. Jan. 4, 2005)). Furthermore, the IDEA affords parents the right to challenge a district’s determination to not classify their child as a child with a disability eligible for services under the statute (20 U.S.C. §1415(b)(6)). Thus, the Ninth Circuit’s fear of a child languishing in a public school without redress or opportunity to ever receive special education services is unfounded.

Moreover, as discussed below, the legislative history of 20 U.S.C. §1412(a)(10)(C)(ii) establishes that its adoption was part of an effort by Congress to resolve the problem of escalating litigation (S. Rep. 105-17, 13 (1997 WL 244967); H.R. Rep. 105-95 (1997 U.S.C.C.A.N. 78, 90)). Nothing precludes Congress from addressing within the statute fiscal considerations associated with the implementation of the IDEA (see, Arlington Central Sch. Dist. Board of Educ. v. Murphy, 548 U.S. at 303).

II. The History Of 20 U.S.C. §1412(a)(10)(C)(ii) Supports Enforcement Of Its Plain Language.

As set forth above, 20 U.S.C. §1412(a)(10)(C)(ii) was first incorporated into the IDEA during the 1997 reauthorization of the statute. From the beginning, a primary concern of the IDEA has been to ensure the availability of a FAPE to all children with disabilities. However, the 1997 reauthorization marked a change in the statute's emphasis which was redirected at ensuring greater access to the general curriculum for students with disabilities and that efforts to educate disabled children are effective.

As indicated by accompanying Senate and House Reports, Congress viewed the 1997 reauthorization "as an opportunity to review, strengthen, and improve IDEA to better educate children with disabilities and enable them to achieve a quality education . . . ” (S. Rep. 105-17, 5 (1997 WL 244967); H.R. Rep. 105-95 (1997 U.S.C.C.A.N. 78, 82)).

One of the ways in which Congress expected the 1997 reauthorization to realize that opportunity was by “assisting educational agencies in addressing the costs of improving special education and related services to children with disabilities . . . ” (Id.). Another was “to clarify the responsibility of public school districts to children with disabilities who are placed by their parents in private schools” and yet another to “resolve a number of issues that [had] been the subject of an increasing amount of litigation in the last few years” (S. Rep. 105-17, 13 (1997 WL 244967); H.R. Rep. 105-95 (1997 U.S.C.C.A.N. 78, 90)).

It is beyond dispute that, ever since this Court’s Burlington decision, litigation over tuition reimbursement has comprised a large majority of special education cases. Neither can it be disputed that the cost of litigation, in addition to the actual reimbursement of tuition, can significantly drain the limited resources available to school districts to ensure that children with disabilities not only have access to a FAPE, but also can achieve a quality education. Thus, it was appropriate for Congress to address these problems within the IDEA itself. As this Court has indicated, “[t]he IDEA . . . does not seek to promote [its over-arching] goals at the expense of all other considerations, including fiscal considerations” (Arlington Central Sch. Dist. Board of Educ. v. Murphy, 548 U.S. at 303). The contested language was specifically designed to curtail a proliferating cost problem that impedes a school district's ability to maximize use of the limited federal funds available to adequately educate disabled children.

The consequences of enforcing the plain language of 20 U.S.C. §1412(a)(10)(C)(ii) might be viewed by some as severe. But they are no more harsh than those imposed by contemporaneously enacted limitations on the right of children with disabilities unilaterally enrolled by their parents in private schools to participate in programs assisted or carried out under the IDEA. Notwithstanding the IDEA's overarching goal of ensuring that all children with disabilities have access to a FAPE, the 1997 reauthorization provided at 20 U.S.C. §1412(a)(10)(A)(i) that the amount of IDEA funds school districts must expend for the provision of services to children unilaterally enrolled by their parents in private school is limited to a proportionate share of those funds. Federal IDEA regulations adopted to implement the 1997 reauthorization further specified that children with disabilities unilaterally enrolled by their parents in private school have no individual right to some or all of the services they would receive if enrolled in a public school (former 34 C.F.R. §§300.454(a)(1); 300.455(a)(2),(3)). Neither do they have an individual right to a due process hearing to challenge any of the services the public school actually offers (former 34 C.F.R. §300.457). Instead, decisions about which children will receive services and what services will be provided to them are made by public school officials in consultation with representatives of private school children with disabilities (former 34 C.F.R. §300.454(a)(2), (b), (c)). Complaints about the services provided are filed with the state educational agency (former 34 C.F.R. §300.457). The 2004 reauthorization and its implementing regulations continue the 1997 statutory and regulatory scheme (20 U.S.C. §1412(a)(10)(A)(iii); 34 C.F.R. §§300.130-150).

Thus, it is clear from the history of its incorporation into the IDEA that the statutory language at issue herein should be upheld and enforced. The decision of the Ninth Circuit should be reversed. A contrary result would contravene the plain language of the statute and the intent of its drafters. It would negatively affect the ability of school districts to provide appropriate educational opportunities to all of their students.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, the decision of the Ninth Circuit should be reversed.

Respectfully submitted,

JAY WORONA
